

Some people like to take out a classic car at the weekend. I like to take out my classic 30 year old C scope VLF TR 2000D detector, with its superior depth penetration. It is ideal for searching fields that have been so called cleaned out. So off I went to a field that no one bothers to search anymore. This is because it has had many ralls on the field over the years. As I started to search the land owner came over to me and said good luck you will need it, there is nothing left in this field. After about 20 minutes I got a stonker of a signal which was screaming out of the headphones and the needle was going off the scale on the meter. I changed the mode to discriminate and it showed good. I thought to myself how could a signal like this had been missed? I put down the shovel and drew the trowel out of the holster, thinking this could be something good and I did not want to damage it. The one thing that I like about this detector is the accuracy when wanting to pin point a find, as you don't have to dig holes big enough for a solider to take cover in. I removed the top three inches and was surprised to find that the object was deeper. I continued to dig carefully deeper and uncovered at eight inches a very nice Celtic mount. I thought not bad for a 30 year old detector which is still working as good as the day I purchased it. Well I had my fun for the day and will be out tomorrow with the RI still looking for the lost treasure in a field that has nothing left in it.

PS my find will be featured in the Searcher shortly.

Yours sincerely

Danny Sharpe
